

Political criminology

Perhaps political criminology is distinguished from political warfare by membership, rather than believing that “political warfare” is an error of conception. Certainly the distinction is critical. When Putin’s Russia attacks the United States government in the manipulation of social reality through disinformation, it is a crime against humanity as a metaphysical terror campaign. When Republican political polarization attacks the United States government in the manipulation of social reality through disinformation, it is likewise a crime against humanity as a metaphysical terror campaign. The experience of these campaigns is one of either foolishness or disturbing. Which is a practical and effective and increasingly well known cloak of invisibility.

In the case of Russian terror, the most heinous evidence appears in domestic policing and judiciary. In the case of U.S. domestic political terror, the most significant evidence may be that which appears in media. If entities like DHS and FBI are performing “dogging” and “needling” harassment via twitter, the significance of those crimes is large. If entities like Senators and Representatives are likewise performing “dogging” and “needling” harassment via media, the significance of those crimes is large. And the expectation of the recognition of current actuality is the conclusion that these concepts are available to assertion as fact.

In both the United States and Russia, and similar evidence is apparent from China and elsewhere, political violence has metaphysical and physical forms which have been criminalized in law. Therefore, if we are to respect the law as members of sovereign humanity, then we must assert and support the sovereignty of humanity by recognizing the criminality of political terror and excavating the foolishness exploited by the criminal intent to compromise the law.

Ideally, our laws have been legislated to assert and support the sovereignty of humanity as founded upon individual wellbeing and welfare in human rights. This is the establishment of the United States found in the Declaration of Independence, and this is the existential principle common to the planetary population. That criminalization exists to assert and support the sovereignty of humanity. Its manipulation in the psychological diseases of delusion is the object of compassion, not the criminal and not his crimes.
