

The experiment, it's a lie to call it that, was a success. Well, perhaps not so much a lie as getting it straight. Object, subject and observer. It proved that the subject was indeed insane, as previously feared. And for this reason it was a success. It was important to know whether the subject was delusional or actually at a loss for his senses. The experiment proved that the subject was both delusional and at a loss for his senses. As expected. No news, there.